This book is primarily an ethnographic study of HIV/AIDS work in Pakistan at the level of government and NGOs. I will be forever indebted to those people in Pakistan who so generously allowed me to work alongside them, especially at the National AIDS Control Programme, and to all of those who shared their thoughts with me in interviews. I may not always have represented their stories in the ways that they had hoped, but I have tried to represent their situations with balance and fairness and to protect their identities as individuals. Ultimately, I hope they will understand the ethical compulsions that led me to describe their field of work in the way that I have, and perhaps they might even recognize something in my descriptions.

The book is the end result of doctoral research carried out at the School of Oriental and African Studies, London, under the supervision of Caroline Osella, who was the most supportive, kind and inspiring mentor I could have wished to have. I was lucky to benefit from insightful advice and mentoring from other faculty in the Department of Anthropology and Sociology, especially David Mosse and Kit Davis, and from the support of fellow PhD students at SOAS. Martine Collumbien at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine, who I had worked with previously on research projects related to HIV/AIDS in Pakistan, was a great support to me throughout. I am also very grateful to my PhD examiners, Ian Harper and Humeira Iqtidar, for their constructive criticisms. Along the way, I presented this work at a number of conferences and workshops that were very influential on my thinking. I would particularly like to thank Laura Bear and Nayanika Mathur, who hosted the conference on 'flexible bureaucracy' at the University of Cambridge in March 2012 and subsequently helped to shape my paper into a contribution to the resulting special issue of The Cambridge Journal of Anthropology, and to the other participants at that conference. Susan Wright gave me some comments at the 'structure inside organizations' workshop at University College London in July 2012 which were very helpful. At the South Asian Anthropology Group conference in September 2013, Martin Webb, Patricia Jeffery and Filippo Osella gave me the conviction to try to voice my critical analysis more forcefully. Nora Kenworthy gave me valuable input as co-editor to a special issue on 'HIV/AIDS scale-up', to which I contributed a paper. I am very grateful to Sumeet Jain, who pointed me towards many of these opportunities for sharing my work and invited me to give a seminar in Edinburgh in June 2014. Pnina Werbner and Steve Lyon engaged positively with my work at the annual Pakistan Workshops in May 2012, 2013 and 2014 and nurtured my interest in bureaucracy.

My PhD fieldwork was funded by a scholarship from the Commonwealth. I am extremely grateful to the Commonwealth Scholarship Commission as it would have been very difficult, if not impossible, to finance a PhD as an international student otherwise. Helping us to get by in London were Kurt and Charlotte Weinberg, who so thoughtfully founded Nansen Village so as to provide affordable housing to international students and their families. It was a wonderful place to live and I learnt much from the other students I encountered there.

I rewrote the thesis as a member of faculty at the Lahore University of Management Sciences and I would like to thank my colleagues in the Anthropology and Sociology programme, particularly Ali Khan and Nida Kirmani, for their support and for pointing me towards useful literature. The students on my undergraduate courses on the anthropology of global health and political anthropology engaged me in interesting discussions, which deepened my understanding of the literatures that I draw upon. Portions of this book are partial revisions of papers that I published previously in which I developed my understanding of the people and processes described here. I would like to acknowledge the granting of permission for this from the copyright holders. Portions of Chapter 2 are from 'The Marketization of HIV/AIDS Governance: Public-Private partnership and Bureaucratic Cultures in Pakistan', in The Cambridge Journal of Anthropology (volume 33, issue 1, pp. 35–48), included by permission of Berghahn Books. Portions of Chapters 3 and 4 are from 'Up-scaling expectations among Pakistan's AIDS bureaucrats: enterprising selves and precarious jobs in a hybrid bureaucracy', in Global Public Health (volume 9, issue 1–2, pp. 72–84), included by permission of Taylor & Francis. Portions of Chapters 6 and 7 are from 'Uncivil society: the politics of HIV activism in Pakistan', in the Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute (volume 20, issue 4, pp. 694–710), included by permission of John Wiley & Sons. Thanks, too, to Holly Tyler, Joshua Pitt and Joanna O'Neill at Palgrave Macmillan, and to the anonymous reviewers to whom they sent the proposal and manuscript, who provided such insightful advice on bringing out the arguments.

My family have been a huge support. I would like to thank my parents and my siblings, my parents-in-law and Colin, George and Trisha, who have shown care and concern as well as interest in my work. Finally, thanks are due to Kaveri, who has lived very closely with this research for many years, and to Ruhi, Leila and Elahe for the happiness that they give us.
