This book was begun at the University of Michigan, researched in Stuttgart, Germany, and completed at the Harvard Society of Fellows and in Eugene, Oregon. I have incurred many debts in each of these places. My dissertation committee—Kathleen Canning, Geoff Eley, Margaret Somers, Laura Downs, and Helmut Puff—helped to make Michigan a uniquely exciting place to study history. Thanks to Andy Donson, Jordan Shapiro, Kathy Pence, Barb Ryan, Carolyn Comiskey, Sharmila Basu, Andrew Goss, and Pax Bobrow, Ann Arbor also became a community and a true home. Mary Wheeler, as I'm sure she already knows, is in a class by herself. In Stuttgart, I benefited from the collegiality and friendship of Scott Beard, Andreas Gestrich, Aimee Burant, Meike Grund, Mark Remshardt, Berthold Heusel, Kriszta Molnar, and Martin Kienzle. David Sabean, Hans Medick, and Dieter Langewiesche graciously offered their expertise at critical stages during my research. In Cambridge, Lisa Wolverton, Kevin Bolan, Adina Astor, Bernard Bailyn, Diana Morse, Jeff Dolven, and Jacob Hacker were among those who helped me through the arduous process of reconceptualization and revision. David Luebke, Richard Biernacki, Lynn Hunt, and Juliane Brand, my editor, offered crucial advice in the home stretch, as did two readers for the University of California Press, one of them David Sabean. Lisa and Wendy stood by me during the happiest as well as the most difficult times, and for that I remain enormously grateful.

Sam Welker, my ninth-grade World Civilizations teacher, taught me that the study of history is a philosophical, not an antiquarian, pursuit.

Funding for this project was provided by a number of institutions, including the Department of History and the Rackham School of Graduate Studies at the University of Michigan, the Council for European Studies in New York, the German Academic Exchange Service (DAAD), and the Social Science Research Council (SSRC). I would also like to recognize, for their unstinting professionalism, the archivists and librarians at the Hauptstaatsarchiv and the Württembergische Landesbibliothek in Stuttgart, as well as the Staatsarchiv in Ludwigsburg.

An earlier version of Chapter 8 appeared as "The Intelligence Gazette (Intelligenzblatt) as a Road Map to Civil Society: Information Networks and Local Dynamism in Germany, 1770s–1840s," in Paradoxes of Civil Society: New Perspectives on Modern German and British History, ed.
